Popularized during the Ming dynasty (1368-1644), tall display tables such as this were used to display precious objects, serve tea, or elevate burning incense. This square example dates to the mid-19th century and features three drawers and a lower shelf. A beaded edge traces the table's paneled sides and continues down the four straight legs ending in hoof feet. The front apron is carved with foliate scrollwork and the shelf with a round medallion of swirling, archaic dragons. Continued...
